Excerpt: . part iv. ventilation. the meaning of the term ventilation as applied to factories and workshops is extensive. In textile mills it means the removal of dust, fibrous matter, and impurity generated in the course of manufacturing. In the trades under the Act of 1864, it refers to the removal of noxious vapours, of excessive heat, of dust from various processes of grinding, which if not prevented would prove most injurious to workers. It has been shown that remedies have been successfully applied to most of the evils consequent on manufacturing in all trades under the extended Act of 1867, but in its application to workshops it bears a different meaning, because its need is felt in other ways. Where workers have suffered from the inspiration of fibrous, mineral, or earthy dust and grit, mechanical means have been effectually used to prevent it, but where workers are employed in large numbers in workshops without any proper ventilation, then another remedy suggests itself for the purpose of purification rather than for removal. The evil to be overcome is serious and grave. The china scourer, or the shoe tip grinder, or the emery polisher, or the ivory turner, runs in and out during intervals of work; but the operative in a workshop, especially the female, remains there all day without change, and is therefore in that respect not so favourably placed. The Act of 1867 presented to us entirely new features in legislation; experience in the...
