He raised his eyes towards the aperture that served for a window as the face of Mark Clements appeared at it, and then turned half round upon his stool, without speaking. Good evening, said the lad, after a brief pause. The stranger did not speak or move. Our shipmate has gone to see your brother hermit, said Clements, with a smile. Ain t you mates? he inquired, after a pause, on finding that he received no reply. The stranger made an impatient movement, but remained silent. What is the other s name? inquired the provoking boy. At this question the man rose quickly, and strode towards the window with such a stern look upon his face that Clements drew back in haste, and retreated to the spot where Dale was waiting for him. But the lad misapprehended the...
