But it has never looked into the anteroom. It should look; but it does not. For there the Count sits, listening and listening----and waiting. And the fuse he lighted is smouldering nearer and nearer. He listens! He waits! The trained eye of Funk sees it. The trained brush of Funk records it--though perhaps Funk himself is unaware of the secret his picture is revealing. The Count hears the soft laughter of women praising their men that return laden from the pursuit of Great Wealth. The Count hears the clink of gold coin, the crackle of crisp bills. He knows that while men continue to pursue Great Vealth, while women continue to laugh over the glittering, heaped-up spoils of that pursuit, no one will care to trouble about the long, slow fuse; no one will care to look into the dark anteroom where he sits silently--where Bernstorff sits silently---waiting.
